So I have a standard string that I wish to store data to, and am using a char* to represent the position in memory. I wish to be able to read only at specific positions, so I decided to create a list of'starting indexes' that I can use to read from. My idea was to store the starting indexes in a char* and then at runtime simply add the current pointer to the starting indexes, but the char* doesn't seem to retain its values after I do pointer arithmetic with it. This is what I have: typedef struct { int i; char* names[100]; } Counter; Counter *GetCounter() { Counter A = (Counter) malloc(sizeof(Counter)); A->i = 1; return A; } //The input here is a std::vector, which is an array of std::strings: std::vector< strings; void Read(Counter *A, int n, int i) 3e33713323
